

The aim of this study is to understand how survivors of domestic violence disclose their private information. Communication privacy management theory is used as a guiding framework to analyze a scaled questionnaire, open-ended questions, and a creation of a timeline that was administered to the participants to collect three different types of data that is rich, powerful and expressive to this sensitive topic. A narrative frequency content analysis was used to find emerging themes.