

This study examines context dependent learning. Participants will watch a video, complete a distraction task, and then be tested over the video. During the video, participants will have mint or fruit gum, after the video half of the participants will switch flavors. Our primary hypothesis is that participants exposed to a consistent stimulus will have better recall. Our secondary hypothesis is that mint flavor will cause participants to perform better than fruit flavor.