

Current literature states absence of cell phones can lead to symptoms of anxiety. The purpose of this study is to determine if reduced access to cell phones cause anxiety in college students. The two conditions are the presence and absence of the participants cell phone. Participants will complete a distraction task then will be given an anxiety measure. We hypothesize that removing participants' cell phones will increase self-reported anxiety.