

English Language Learners (ELLs) have become a large population within the U.S. school systems. The task of accommodating the needs of these students can be a daunting task for all teachers. There is a variety of research regarding translators and small group robust vocabulary instruction in order to help emergent bilingual students. Applying these research practices can help accommodate the increase of students and help them adjust to the English language in everyday life.