

The partnership between mental health and education has been a beneficial partnership for adolescents. For the past decade, mental health workers and educators have collaborated to implement intervention programs, which have supported the positive mindset of adolescents. For the study, I worked with students with disabilities over a three months span. My research found that by helping students communicate their problems, adolescents learned to manage problems that occur in school and their daily lives.