

An overall analysis of countries by comparing how their various levels of democracy influence the overall number of domestic terrorist attacks, and then the proportional success of these respective attacks. By running a linear regression using fixed effects, connections were made to see how democracy levels influence total attacks and their success. The project viewed 205 different countries over a 21 year period; while also including several control variables.