

Two ways fluorescence quenching occurs are electron transfer and hydrogen atom transfer. Quenchers react with the excited state molecule to speed up its return to the ground state. By evaluating the rate constant and Gibbs Free Energy from the results of spectroscopic and electrochemical procedures it can be determined which of these two processes occur.