

Heavy metals like lead have been shown to impair learning in humans. It is unknown whether metals affect learning in invertebrates like fruit flies. The effect of manganese on learning and memory in Drosophila melanogaster larvae was investigated. Larvae were trained to associate an odorant with a reward and then tested to determine whether this changed their odor preference. Na•ve odor preference and locomotion were investigated as possible confounding factors.