

This conditional process study examined the relations between stress and student-athletes at Marietta College in Marietta, OH. Furthermore, this study explored the effects of emotional intelligence in both mediating and moderating roles. Results were gathered through surveys analyzing athletes' academic performance by GPA, how well the organization supports each athlete, and overall levels of stress each athlete feels. This study hypothesized that more stress perceived and lower perceived organizational support by the athlete would correlate to a lower GPA.