

This paper is a quantitative analysis focused around the research question: how does ideological composition of government influence the level of immigration? Specifically, this study looks at European Union states and their levels of right-wing legislators in association with immigration rates. With the rise in nationalist and anti-immigration rhetoric, understanding willingness to enter a state and what functions as a deterrent to immigration is integral in structuring future policy as well as predicting population influxes.