

This project is an interdisciplinary study aimed to investigate the social implications of geology, geomorphology, and geography in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. The city limits are geographically divided, encouraging human adaptation through economy and infrastructure, and the rivers are essential for connecting the city to the western U.S. Also, as the site of many significant mineral resources, Pittsburgh's industry and economy grew rapidly. This project was completed primarily through literature review and interpreting maps.