

We will observe how priming affects perception of a human face. Pictures of baby animals will be used to prime participants. All participants will be exposed to baby animals and a neutral stimulus. Level of attraction for the human face will be reported using a Likert scale. We hypothesize that participants will rate the images paired with baby animals higher than the images paired with neutral stimuli.