

Many women routinely take a daily oral contraceptive without considering the side effects or mortality risk. The medical community has long known that oral contraceptive prescriptions (OCPs) can be directly linked to increased risk of venous thromboembolism (VTE) and cerebral vein thromboses (CVT) in otherwise healthy young women. It is important for providers to educate patients about the risks of what many consider a benign drug.